Ironically enough, while exploring the wild and wide world of remodeling, we have found it to be true that the un-masterful bathroom is the final frontier of rooms in the house to get renovated. At first glance through the binoculars, this makes perfect sense as typically nobody sees this land, except for the one(s) native to the space. The un-masterful bathroom can be a dirty little secret - the equivalent of having a broken stove and a rusting and dilapidated AMC Gremlin sitting on the lawn in front of the house - except nobody sees the un-masterful bathroom.

Initial home remodels are commonly saved for the more oft-traveled areas by visitors, and spaces occasionally used for entertaining. While I do not discount the importance and the joy found in updating kitchens and common living-spaces, I do believe that the domicile of the Queen and/or King of the house should not be overlooked. The irony lies in the intimacy, on many levels, that takes place in this room on a regular and daily basis.

As creatures of habit, this is the first room we visit in the morning and the final space that we see in the evening prior to our attempted slumber. We rub elbows with our soul partner in this space, while planning that days' goals, or the evenings plans and aspirations. While showering or taking a hot bath, it is an arena in which we clear our head while waking up or ponder the limitless potential of our dreams in a liquid meditation. It is a place where the King and Queen of the castle take care of business on many levels. It demands and deserves the same attention, if not more, than any other space in the house. It is a potential sanctuary for the individual soul, as well as a spring of love for the coupling partnership. It should be treated as such.

The un-masterful bath should be a Masterful Bath, fit for a Queen and a King.
